Amending IRA Documents

Change is inevitable—especially in the IRA world. And, in this world, with change comes action. That action? Amending IRA documents.

The IRS alerts the IRA industry when IRA documents must be amended. Typically, the IRA plan agreement and the disclosure statement require amending when new laws cause a “material” change in IRA documentation. The financial disclosure, however, is never amended.

Understanding when amendments or new forms are necessary isn’t always easy. Generally, when the President enacts major tax laws affecting IRAs amendments or new plan agreements and disclosure statements are necessary to keep IRAs in compliance with the law. The penalty to financial organizations for not providing a plan agreement and disclosure statement amendment to an IRA owner could be as much as $100 per IRA. See the following pages for major tax law changes that may have warranted IRA amendments.

Missing Any Amendments?

When financial organizations review their files to determine if all amendments have been made, they may find that some amendments were missed. Although a financial organization can’t go back and make up for a required amendment that wasn’t completed by a specific deadline, a financial organization can use a universal, or “catch-all,” amendment to bring IRAs into compliance.

A catch-all amendment is made by sending a complete and current plan agreement and disclosure statement to all existing IRA owners. The catch-all amendment contains all rule changes covered in previous amendments. There is no guarantee that the IRS won’t assess penalties for past failures to amend by the deadline, but the IRS may treat a catch-all amendment as a good-faith effort to bring the IRA into compliance.

Changes in the IRA Department?

When financial organizations merge, are acquired, or purchase other organizations, the change in ownership may affect IRA documentation. When a change of ownership occurs, the financial organization should review all IRA-related procedures and documentation to ensure a smooth transition.

The newly created or purchasing organization generally assumes the responsibilities of the former organization. Although each purchase or merger must be dealt with on a case-by-case basis, many acquisitions and mergers require some form of amendment to the previous IRA plan documents. The procedures to change a trustee or custodian or to alter plan language are controlled by IRA plan document language and by state law.

A financial organization may have another reason to amend if it decides to change IRA forms providers and the forms it uses. The financial organization should review both the forms it currently uses and the forms it wants to use. In some cases, the financial organization may simply start using the new forms. In other cases, the financial organization may need to notify IRA owners of specific changes in the IRA program resulting from new language in the IRA documents. A financial organization also may amend for a law change at the same time it amends for new forms.
